is responsible for listing and maintaining the quality of the securities traded on the exchange. It also oversees the listing of new securities and monitors the performance of listed companies. The stock exchange is a self-regulatory organization, which means it is not controlled by a central authority. Instead, it is run by a board of directors who are elected by the members. The stock exchange has a strict set of rules and regulations that must be followed by all members. These rules cover everything from the way companies are listed to the way they trade their shares. The stock exchange also has a code of ethics that all members must follow. This ensures that the market remains fair and transparent. The stock exchange is also responsible for ensuring that the market is efficient and that prices reflect the true value of the securities. It does this by monitoring the market and making sure that there is enough liquidity. The stock exchange also helps to promote the growth of the economy by providing a platform for investment. It does this by encouraging companies to list their shares and by providing a place for investors to buy and sell them. The stock exchange is a vital part of the financial system and plays a key role in the economy.
